Assessing Student Participation in Online Discussions

When assessing online discussion specifically, it is crucial to communicate your expectations to the students so that they know what is ahead of them.

- Indicate whether the discussion will be graded.
- It is usually not good practice to grade based on the number of postings. You may require students to complete a certain number as a minimum, but well-constructed, thoughtful postings are more beneficial to the discussion than many shorter “I agree” or “Good point” responses.
- Use solid criteria to determine what a “good” and “poor” response may be. Provide a rubric and sample discussions to your students.
- Some instructors require students to provide a self-assessment report of their discussion contributions. Students may copy and paste actual examples of their postings to support their grade recommendation.

Other things to consider…

- In online discussions, instructors can offer immediate short feedback. A simple “Good job, Scott” or “I haven’t heard from you recently, Scott” can help maintain active participation.
- Think carefully about the amount of time required for students to meet the discussion requirements, as well as the amount of time it will take for you to assess the quality of their work.
- Spend the time to construct creative, challenging, and engaging discussion assignments, which promote participation.
- You may provide a few guidelines regarding the polite, constructive conduct of online communication. These guidelines are commonly referred to as "netiquette."
